ENERGISING TALENT

The South African Energy Sector is one of the largest primary and secondary employers in South Africa, requiring a large amount of technically skilled employees across a variety of functions. Tertiary institutions are failing to produce graduates of a sufficient quantity and often quality, resulting in intense competition for qualified and experienced employees. In addition, skilled and experienced workers often leave for better-paying jobs abroad.

Frequently we hear that "There is not enough talent with adequate knowledge, skills and experience to service the needs of the sector."

The panel will discuss whether there is in fact a shortage of talent in the sector and what can be done to address the situation. Are there short-term fixes that can be applied or is a longer term programme necessary? Is this the responsibility of the state, or academic institutions or should the private sector be leading the drive to increase the talent pool?
